THEME : "The value of water"

The new gold of our age is water. This realization grows out of improved understanding of the diversity of demands that exists both implicitly and explicitly for water, and better understanding of the ways in which current water use policies and practices are diminishing the overall supplies available now and in the future.

In the contemporary world, water policy operating at local to national (and more recently international) levels plays a crucial role in establishing rules and practices that determine who receives water, how much, from what resources, at what quality and for what purposes. In the recent decades, the World Bank has been among those advocating the use of water and to reform water management, particularly in less-developed countries. This recent emphasis based on the belief that related to water in these areas arise from the dominance of the bureaucratic state over national market forces. Establishment of water policies based institutions, in their view, provide

Problems of availability, quality and access.

Indeed, today, access to hot and cold running water are taken for granted in developed countries and megapolises around the world. However, when problems arise, when the water no longer flows as usual, the water suddenly becomes/acquires a pronounced value. When it is absorbed in the daily gestures, tap water is not an object for a particular concern. But when nothing happens when you open a tap, or when its quality is poor. We obliged to reinvest in value of a resources formerly considered inexhaustible and available on a permanent basis. Faced with this reality, some people called into question to the responsibility of water management. Without taking into account the place of tap water into more general natural cycle.

Thus, water is considered as a source of symbolic element, a resources, a commercial product and a service. Each perspective will have to attribute different kinds of value to water, but there are many interconnection between the perspective and the particulars as all these are different kinds of values and importance mention in the question. Water in turn, serve to build norms and reference for of decisions made by individual from highest levels of social organisation. Thus, water becomes an object enfolding different kinds of values to attribute the interest of many people. Also, water is also play a vital role for our health, it helps us to ~~lose~~ loss ^{our} of weight, it aids in our digestion, it helps to hydrate our skin. Thus, we can say that water is life, water sustains us. This vary changes from culture, community, state, space and time.
